Feeling as if you are being watched? You probably are. The Transportation Security Administration (TSA) in the United States recently began rolling out a new security program, Screening Passengers by Observation Techniques (SPOT), at dozens of airports around the country. Using behavioral profiling, SPOT aims to identify "high-risk individuals" by monitoring passengers' body language. Under this initiative, "behavior detection officers" are trained to recognize involuntary gestures, subtle facial twitches, and changes in vocal pitch that signal stress or deceit. A passenger displaying suspicious behavior is taken aside for additional screening.

But do such programs work? In Israel, where officers get nine weeks of training, behavioral screening is considered effective. But most TSA screeners receive only four days' instruction; the idea that they will be able to master the art of behavior recognition with such meager training is "preposterous." Meanwhile, the Department of Homeland Security just finished testing an automated version of SPOT using a device called Cogito, which works in a manner similar to a polygraph device. Passengers answer a set of simple questions displayed on a touch screen while inserting one hand into a sensor that measures biometric responses, such as sweat levels and blood pressure.

37 According to the passage, which of the following statements is true?
(A) SPOT is a system that was developed by Cogito.
(B) Subtle facial twitches and changes in vocal pitch can arouse suspicion.
(C) The Department of Homeland Security is an airport security system.
(D) Polygraph is a graphic design software.

38 According to the passage, how long is a US screener trained before starting to work?
(A) 4 days. (B) 40 days. (C) 9 weeks. (D) 9 months.

39 What is the synonym of the word "preposterous"?
(A) Absurd. (B) Exciting. (C) Severe. (D) Manageable.

40 According to the passage, what can Cogito do?
(A) It can measure a person's blood pressure and weight.
(B) It can measure a person's sweat level and heart beat rate.
(C) It can measure a person's blood pressure and sweat level.
(D) It can measure a person's weight and heart beat rate.
